What you need

- No materials required
- Optional: printed prompts or a shared notes page

How to run it

1. Choose a relaxed moment and agree whether you want a short question round or a single conversation starter.
2. Take turns choosing a card. One partner answers, then the other may answer the same question or offer a related thought.
3. Ask a follow-up only if the person seems comfortable and interested. Do not turn a short answer into a problem-solving session.
4. After a few cards, choose whether to continue, save a question for later, or end the activity. Either partner can pass without explaining.

Keep the tone collaborative

Couples questions work best as invitations, not tests. The cards below focus on ordinary shared life: small routines, planning, favorite places, and new activities. They do not ask partners to prove how well they know each other or compare who contributes more.

If a prompt brings up a practical topic, ask whether your partner wants to talk it through now or another time. A game is not the right place to demand a decision or revisit a disagreement.

- Take turns rather than asking one partner to answer for both.
- Accept a pass or a short answer without pressure.

Choose a format that fits the day

For a quiet evening, each partner can choose two cards and answer at their own pace. For a date night, use one prompt between activities. A short activity may be more enjoyable than trying to complete the deck.

Some couples like writing down a shared plan, such as a weekend outing. Others prefer to talk without recording anything. Choose what feels comfortable and keep the conversation private unless both people agree otherwise.

- No score, winner, or correct answer is needed.
- Put away phones if both partners want a more focused moment.

When a question feels too big

A prompt can be skipped, reframed, or saved. If either partner is tired or not in the mood, choose a lighter question about a meal, playlist, or local outing. These cards do not replace direct communication or professional support for a relationship concern.

A thoughtful answer can be simple. A partner may name a preference without needing to justify it. The other person can respond with curiosity, share their own answer, or thank them for answering.

- Avoid using the cards to test trust or commitment.
- Do not share private answers outside the relationship without mutual agreement.
