- No materials required
- Optional: question cards for a seated group

How to run it

1. Choose one question that fits the setting and ask it naturally; you do not need to announce a formal round.
2. Listen to the answer without planning a rapid list of follow-up questions. Let the speaker decide whether to give a quick answer or a longer story.
3. If the person seems interested, use one gentle follow-up based on a detail they already shared. If not, acknowledge the answer and change topics.
4. For a group round, give each person the option to answer, pass, or ask the next question. Keep the pace conversational.

What makes a question open-ended

An open-ended question invites more than a yes or no. “What makes a weekend feel restful?” gives someone room to name a routine, a place, or a small preference. The best choice still depends on the conversation: a thoughtful question can feel awkward if it appears without context.

A good opener is clear and easy to understand. Avoid stacking several questions together or asking for a full life story. People can answer with one sentence, and a follow-up should use something they volunteered.

- Ask one thing at a time.
- Prefer “what,” “how,” or “which” when it sounds natural, but do not force a formula.

Listen before you follow up

A follow-up shows attention when it grows from the answer. If a friend mentions a local park, you might ask what they enjoy there. If they answer briefly or look ready to move on, let the topic end. Open-ended conversation is reciprocal: share your own answer too, rather than keeping the other person under a spotlight.

In a group, avoid directing every question to one person. A round-robin format, paired conversation, or shared response can give people different ways to participate. Passing should be ordinary, not a special event.

- Reflect one detail you heard before asking another question.
- Do not turn a light opener into probing about private history.

Use these prompts as a flexible menu

The cards below cover everyday routines, places, hobbies, food, travel, and ideas. You can ask one at dinner, use three as a short activity, or choose a prompt when a conversation pauses. Change the wording to fit your group.

If a question does not suit the moment, skip it. The purpose is to make room for an enjoyable exchange, not to complete the whole list. A host can model a short answer first and make the pass option explicit.

- Keep the discussion voluntary and balanced.
- Avoid collecting or sharing another person's response without permission.
